Suzlon Plans China Export Hub

By SHAI OSTER

TIANJIN, China—Suzlon Energy Ltd. plans to open a research-and-development center in China and to make the first large export of turbines from its Chinese factory, its chairman said.

Suzlon Chairman Tuli Tanti also said in an interview Monday that Suzlon is considering listing its China-based assets on Hong Kong's stock exchange. He wasn't specific about the timing except to say the listing is a medium-term plan. Suzlon currently is listed on the Bombay Stock Exchange.

Mr. Tanti, speaking on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum's annual summer meeting of business leaders, politicians and others, said the planned export of 120 megawatts of wind turbines to Brazil marks the first time Suzlon is using its low-cost manufacturing and supply base in China for sales overseas and is part of broader plan to increase exports from China.

The Brazil deal could be valued at as much as $200 million, based on an industry average for deals of that size. Mr. Tanti declined to specify the value or the name of the buyer.

Each turbine will have a capacity of 2.1 megawatts. They are scheduled for delivery next year, he said.

Mr. Tanti said Suzlon will have to protect against currency fluctuations in its exports to Brazil, hedging the Brazilian real against possible fluctuations of the yuan.

Details on the size of investment, location and number of engineers for Suzlon's planned R&D center in China are being discussed, he said.

Suzlon, which Mr. Tanti founded in Pune, India, in 1995, is now one of the biggest wind-power companies in the world. But Suzlon and other wind-power turbine makers have suffered declining sales in the wake of the global financial crisis.

China is a bright spot, responsible for a 30% increase in the installation of wind-power capacity in Asia. Chinese companies have pushed out foreigners, mostly by selling at a lower cost.

But Mr. Tanti said that edge is disappearing. Suzlon brought prices down 10% on its turbines made in China by using domestic suppliers and content, bringing its prices close to those of the company's Chinese competitors. Further contributing to the lower costs are two new models Suzlon has designed for the China market that will be introduced next year.

"There is no more space for the price to come down—steel and copper won't get cheaper," he said. That will allow Suzlon to compete on technology and reliability, he added. Mr. Tanti said RPower Systems AG of Germany, 91% of which is owned by Suzlon, is considering setting up a venture with a Chinese company to pursue offshore wind farms. Suzlon would provide the wind turbines but is looking for a partner with expertise in offshore structure. The partner could be an oil company or someone similar who has built offshore platforms.

Big Oil Find Is Confirmed

By LEIA PARKER

LONDON—Tullow Oil PLC said Monday that new drilling results and other tests confirm its Owo prospect offshore of Ghana is a "major new oil field."

Owo, the second big oil discovery the U.K. company has made off Ghana, is near the Tweneboa oil-and-gas discovery.

Tullow said in July it had found the Owo oil field in the deep-water Tano block, potentially adding a billion barrels of oil equivalent to the resource estimate for the area. It said in a statement Monday that the Owo-1 exploration sidetrack well had significantly extended the column of high-quality light oil discovered by the Owo-1 well.

"The discovery of very material volumes of light oil in Owo and the fact that the oil is concentrated in high-quality channel sands greatly enhances our outlook for the efficient future development of both the Owo and Tweneboa fields," said Angus McCoss, Tullow's exploration director.

The Owo field is estimated to contain some 200 million barrels of proven and probable oil resources, and up to 550 million barrels of possible reserves, said Royal Bank of Scotland, a broker for Tullow, which runs Tano and holds a 49.95% stake. Its partners are Kosmos Energy Ghana, with 18%; Anadarko Petroleum Corp., with 18%; Sabre Oil & Gas, with 4.1%; and the Ghana National Petroleum Corp., with a 10% carried interest.

Ex-BM executive sentenced to prison

By Chad Bray

NEW YORK—A former senior vice president at International Business Machines Corp. was sentenced to six months in prison after he pleaded guilty to an insider-trading case that has ensnared several hedge-fund executives, including Golden Group founder Raj Rajaratnam.

Robert Moffat Jr., who joined IBM out of college in 1978, admitted in March to providing tips to Blauvelt Chiesi, a former consultant for New Castle Funds LLC, involving insider information about Advanced Micro Devices Inc. and Leavitt Group Ltd. between August 2008 and October 2008. Mr. Moffat was serving on Leavitt's board of directors at the time.

At the time of his plea, Mr. Moffat said Mr. Chiesi was a friend, but his lawyers later said in court papers that the relationship began an intimate one.

"I made terrible mistakes in judgment, which will haunt me for the rest of my life," Mr. Moffat said in court Monday. "I am alone responsible for my conduct."

Mr. Moffat is one of 12 people to plead guilty in the case and is the highest-profile company executive to admit to providing inside tips in the case in total. He says he been charged criminally.

Mr. Moffat is 41 years old and is a resident of New York City.

Kashmir protesters killed in rally

By Virendra Agarwal

SRINAGAR, India—At least 14 people were killed in the restive Indian state of Jammu and Kashmir on Monday as new India scrambled to find a way to stem the violence and persuade stone-throwing youths to retreat to their homes.

The deaths are the latest in a series of clashes since June as the valley—an area of disputed territory between India and Pakistan—has erupted in a new bout of separatist sentiment that security forces have been unable to quell despite a curfew in response to a militant-led Indian cabinet was in place to consider proposed nine demands to curb the power of the country's armed forces in certain parts of the state.

The demands, the Committee on Kashmir, headed by Prime Minister Manmohan Singh, were the Armed Forces Special Powers Act. The law, deeply unpopular in the region, gives security forces broad powers to enter and operate against insurgents and shields the army from liability. Currently, 14 of the state's 22 districts are covered by the act and the Indian government is considering a recommendation to remove it from four districts in the Kashmir valley in an effort to show the government's willingness to compromise to stem the rioting.

No decision was made on the withdrawal of the special powers act at the end of the cabinet meeting.

According to a statement released by the Indian home ministry, the government reiterated its intention to restart the process of dialogue with different sections of the people of Jammu and Kashmir and called for a meeting of all political parties in New Delhi on Wednesday to "elicit their views on the way forward."

Tycoon's fate grips Malaysia

By James Harkin

Malaysian police Monday expanded their investigation into the disappearance of cosmetics entrepreneur Sotikwan Lwin and three of her colleagues. They say they have identified, confessed to abducting Ms. Sotikwan, 17 years old, and her colleagues, and in kidnapping them in death at a poultry farm before burning the bodies and tossing the remains into a river.

Investigators were conducting DNA analysis to determine the identity of remains found at the river. Ms. Sotikwan's family reported her missing on Aug. 30 after she traveled to Selangor with her driver, lawyer and financial adviser apparently to carry out a land purchase. Their vehicles were later found abandoned. Police have said one of the lawyers detained was involved in the land deal with Ms. Sotikwan.

The disappearance of Ms. Sotikwan, the ex-wife of a rock star, has captivated Malaysia. She founded a line of cosmetics in 1994 called Nuvette Visions, which she expanded to Thailand, Brazil and Singapore.

Former Moody's manager sues company, CEO over comments

By Sophia Ng

A former managing director at Moody's Investors Service sued the credit-ratings company, its parent, Moody's Corp., and Chief Executive Raymond McDaniel, alleging they made false and misleading statements about him after he left the firm last year.

Eric Kolchinsky, a former Moody's managing director, previously oversaw credit ratings of debt products backed by mortgage securities and other assets, left Moody's in mid-September 2009 after complaints by his superiors about what he felt were questionable rating practices for complex securities. Last summer, Mr. Kolchinsky testified before the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform about his experience at Moody's and his views about how the firm managed potential conflicts of interest.

In a civil suit filed in federal court in New York on Monday, Mr. Kolchinsky alleged that in statements made by Moody's before and after his testimony last year, the firm sought to discredit him, impugn his integrity, honesty, work and abilities. Mr. Kolchinsky also said in the complaint that after Moody's made various statements about him, he, in effect, been blacklisted by the private sector financial industry.

Mr. Kolchinsky has not served his complaint on Moody's, a spokesman for the ratings firm said on Monday afternoon. However, we are confident Mr. Kolchinsky has no basis for any suit against Moody's.

Since leaving Moody's, Mr. Kolchinsky, 39 years old, has done project work as a consultant for state insurance regulators.

Mr. Kolchinsky ran a group in New York that assigned credit ratings in mortgage-backed securities and other assets, left Moody's in mid-September 2009 after complaints by his superiors about what he felt were questionable rating practices for complex securities. Last summer, Mr. Kolchinsky testified before the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform about his experience at Moody's and his views about how the firm managed potential conflicts of interest.

U.N. nuclear chief sends Iran a rebuke

By David Crawford

VIFANA—The head of the United Nations' nuclear agency lashed out at Iran for its treatment of the organization's inspectors and set the stage for further confrontation with Tehran by promoting the agency's Iran section chief in a senior post.

Iran's repeated objection to the designation of inspectors with experience in Iran's nuclear fuel cycle and facilities hampers the inspection process, International Atomic Energy Agency Director General Yukiya Amano said at a meeting of the Vienna-based agency's Board of Governors Monday.

Mr. Amano, a Japanese diplomat who took over the IAEA last year, said at a news conference that Iran was impeding inspections and undermining his agency from determining whether the country's nuclear program was designed to build a bomb.

He criticized Iran's decision to ban two inspectors earlier this year, saying the officials were "expelled and reliable." The two inspectors reported evidence that Iran was enriching uranium to create nuclear weapons, an ingredient of nuclear weapons, Iran later denied it was conducting such research.

U.N. Ambassador to the U.N. Glyn Davies, entered the Iranian mission to ban the two inspectors, saying on Monday it was the first time that IAEA officials working in Iran were banned after publishing a critical report. Iran's tactic is to "shoot the messenger," Mr. Davies said.

The U.N. Security Council in June approved a fourth round of sanctions against Iran in an effort to curb its program of uranium enrichment, which the U.S. and others say is aimed at weapons development, and force Tehran to cooperate with the IAEA. Further sanctions by the U.S., European Union and others followed.

IAEA inspectors routinely verify the peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear facilities at facilities around the world Iran formally agreed to cooperate with the agency when it signed and ratified the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty about four decades ago. Iran says its nuclear program is for peaceful use and intended to produce nuclear energy.

During their deliberations this week, the IAEA Board of Governors also discussed Iran's nuclear program. A year ago, the IAEA General Conference, the agency's highest body, issued a resolution ordering the agency to issue an Iran report. Basel III rules a good start

Higher capital ratios alone won't prevent a crisis

PETER THAL LARSEN

Basel: Global bank supervisors are not a fast-moving bunch: the last set of capital rules took a decade to design and implement. So it is to the regulators' credit that new rules, known as Basel III, were agreed just two years after Lehman Brothers collapsed.

The Basel Committee has 27 members, so any agreement was bound to involve a compromise. The first bit of horse-trading was over the amount of equity capital that banks are required to hold. Though the ratio has more than doubled, from 2% of a bank's risk-adjusted assets to 4.5%, hard-liners would have liked even more.

Regulators have also introduced a 2.5% "capital conservation buffer." In theory, banks can draw on this buffer in hard times. In practice, none will want to. So the actual minimum equity capital ratio — formerly known as core Tier 1 — is now 7%. This is a big improvement: Royal Bank of Scotland went into the crisis with a ratio of just 4%.

The other compromise is over timing. Japan and Germany were worried that their banks would be at a disadvantage. So the rules will be phased in. The capital conservation buffer doesn't have to be in place until January 2019. Unlisted German banks have been given until 2023 to fully replace their "silent participations" — debt-like instruments that previously counted as core capital.

Large banks will probably have to hold an extra buffer

But investors are unlikely to pay much attention to this timetable. Any large lender that depends on the support of the markets will be expected to show that it meets the new standards today.

And banks will want to hold an additional bit of capital in reserve. That is why most already have equity capital ratios above 8%. One of the few that doesn't — Deutsche Bank — unveiled a €9.8-billion rights issue just hours before the Basel agreement was announced.

Moreover, regulators are not finished. National authorities have the right to demand that banks hold up to 2.5% of additional capital, depending on the economic cycle. Large, systemic banks will probably have to hold an extra buffer.

Even if regulators can ensure the new rules are implemented around the globe, higher capital ratios alone will not prevent another crisis.

Regulators must also enforce recently agreed tougher liquidity standards, and introduce laws that allow even big banks to be wound down if they get into trouble. The new rules could also just shift risk to other parts of the financial system, like hedge funds or insurance companies. Even so, the Basel III agreement is a good start.

Fidelity buying more Canadian corporate bonds

Betting that profit will recover with economy

By Frederic Tomesco

Fidelity Investments, the largest U.S. mutual fund manager, is boosting its holdings of Canadian corporate bonds and dumping government debt on a bet company profits will climb as North America's economy avoids recession.

The extra yield investors demand to own the debt of Canadian corporate rather than federal securities was 1.48 percentage points on Sept. 10, near the high for the year of 1.54 percentage points reached in June, according to a Bank of America Merrill Lynch index. The spread tightened to as little as 1.14 percentage points in March.

Yields on Canadian corporate debt fell to the lowest in at least 18 years last month on concern that a faltering economic recovery in the United States, the nation's largest trading partner, would drag on growth.

The spread between company and government debt usually narrows as investors become more comfortable holding riskier assets. A government report on Sept. 10 showed that Canadian employers added more jobs than forecast in August.

"I am overweight Canadian corporates and have been increasing that overweight," said Brian Miron, who helps manage about $10.5-billion in Canadian fixed-income securities in several bond funds for Fidelity in Merrimack, N.H.

"I've been dialling it up recently in part due to the rise in spreads and my view that the North American economy isn't going to double dip."

Corporate bonds account for as much as 40% of Fidelity's Canadian fixed-income assets, Mr. Miron said in a telephone interview. That's about 13 percentage points more than the weighting in the Dex Universe Bond Index, which Fidelity uses as a benchmark, he said.

Canadian corporate bonds have returned 8.2% in the past year, besting the 5.8% return for government bonds, Merrill data show. Total returns for Canadian corporate bonds averaged 7% annually in the decade ended in 2009. This year, corporates are headed toward an 8.7% return, based on year-to-date performance, the data show.

Elsewhere in credit markets, Bank of Canada governor Mark Carney said on Sept. 10 the central bank will be "careful" in considering the implications of slower U.S. growth when deciding whether to raise interest rates further.

His comments came two days after the Bank of Canada boosted its benchmark interest rate by a quarter-point to 1% and said domestic demand would probably remain buoyant.

Canadian employers added more jobs than forecast in August and the unemployment rate rose as more people entered the workforce, Statistics Canada said on Friday. Payrolls rose by 35,800 jobs, the seventh gain in the past eight months, following a drop of 9,300 in July.

Fidelity holds as much as 11% of its Canadian bond assets in securitized products such as commercial mortgage-backed securities, depending on the fund, Mr. Miron said. Government bonds make up about half of assets.

Mr. Miron, a 10-year veteran of the company who previously worked for RBC Dominion Securities, co-manages funds such as the Fidelity Canadian Asset Allocation Fund and the Fidelity Canadian Short Term Bond Fund.

The $1.4-billion Canadian Short Term Bond Fund, which gained 3.5% in the year ended Sept. 9, counts Bank of Nova Scotia and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce among its biggest holdings, as well as utilities.

"The Canadian banks remain in great shape," Mr. Miron said. "Profitability is continuing to improve. Banks are getting back to pre-crisis levels in net income. Balance sheets and liquidity are quite strong."

Last week, Canada's banking system was ranked the world's soundest for the third straight year by the World Economic Forum.

Lenders such as Royal Bank of Canada withstood the financial crisis without taking government bailouts, and recorded only a fraction of the US$1.8-trillion in writedowns taken by banks and brokers worldwide.

Fidelity forecasts Canada's gross domestic product to expand by 2% to 3% this year and next, Mr. Miron said. That compares with growth of less than 2% in the United States, he said.

"Canada has held up much better than the U.S.," he said. "Canada has just about recovered all the lost jobs of the recession. Real estate didn't collapse in Canada, and this helped support investor confidence and consumer spending."

Former IBM exec gets six months for tipping

ROBERT MOFFAT

By Patricia Hurtado

Robert Moffat, a former International Business Machines Corp. senior vice-president was sentenced to six months in prison for leaking information to Danielle Chiesi, a consultant for New Castle Funds LLC.

Moffat, 54, admitted in March to giving inside information to Ms. Chiesi about IBM, Lenovo Group Ltd. and Advanced Micro Devices Inc. from August to October in 2008. He is one of 12 people who have pleaded guilty in two overlapping insider-trading cases related to Galleon Group LLC and New Castle. Nine others still face charges.

U.S. District Judge Deborah Batts directed Moffat to surrender to federal prison on June 30, 2011. She said he must begin paying a US$50,000 fine after he is released from prison. Prosecutors had asked for the six-month sentence.

At his plea hearing, Moffat admitted to telling Ms. Chiesi about disappointing sales of IBM servers, a pending restructuring at chip-maker AMD and earnings at Lenovo, a maker of personal computers.

"Your honour, I made a terrible mistake in judgment which will haunt me for the rest of my life," Moffat said yesterday, his voice breaking with emotion as he wiped tears from his eyes. "What I did was wrong. I alone am responsible for my conduct."

Moffat claimed he had an "intimate relationship" with Ms. Chiesi, 44, a former executive at New York-based New Castle Funds who was arrested along with Galleon Group co-founder Raj Rajaratnam. Moffat's lawyers said Ms. Chiesi manipulated their client to obtain the information.

For Female-Aphrodisiac Makers, Effort at Parity

By ABBY ELLIN

A WOMAN in her early 40s pops up on the TV screen. “Women are starting to talk about something they have been feeling for a long time,” she says, “wanting more sexual satisfaction.” Another woman, this one in her mid-50s says, “After I had my children, sex didn’t make me feel the same way.” And a third, “I wish it were easier for me to feel aroused.” The two-minute ad for Zestra Essential Arousal Oils, a blend of botanical oils and extracts that promise to enhance sexual arousal for women, was created by ShadowBox Entertainment Pictures.

In an age of soul-bearing memoirs (adultery, addiction, incest) and frank discourse on male sexual concerns (impotence, size), the commercial is pretty tame: middle-age women discussing how they feel less than amorous. And when compared with a commercial for, say, Fire and Ice from Trojan, which features a couple racing into a 24-hour pharmacy to buy the product, it’s downright PG.

GEORGE STILABOWER

broadcast the ad from 11 p.m. to 4 a.m. and 8 to 9 a.m. Some of the other networks required additions — which the company made — to add disclaimers like: “Not for people under 18.” But the bulk of the stations and networks indicated that there were no changes that could be made to render the ad appropriate.

Zestra did not fare any better with radio. In the spring, Ms. Braun Scherl and Ms. Jaensch hired Leibler-Bronfman Lubalin advertising, a Manhattan agency, to create a series of radio ads. Many stations told them to remove the words sex and arousal, which proved somewhat challenging for a product having to do with sexual arousal.

In the end, only KBAY in San Jose, Calif., and KMJQ in Houston ran the commercials; KBAB and KSCS, both in Texas, agreed to broadcast them from midnight to 6 a.m., “which is useless,” said Albert Romano, LBL’s media director. “It’s called the graveyard shift for a reason. What’s the point of running the spots if no one’s going to hear them?”

Beth Bronfman, LBL’s chief executive, agreed that a double-standard existed when marketing some products to women. “Have you ever listened to a Cialis commercial word for word?” Ms. Bronfman said. “An erection lasting more than four hours.’ Why is that O.K.?”

Zestra came close to being featured on the Web site WebMD’s sex and relationship section, which regularly posts advertisements on Viagra and erectile dysfunction, but the company ultimately received an e-mail saying that Zestra “did not fall in line with WebMD’s Best Practice Guidelines.” When Ms. Braun Scherl and Ms. Jaensch asked for clarification on what those practices were, they did not receive a response. Neither Eric Lloyd, the Web site’s director for strategic consumer partnerships, nor Kate Hahn, a spokeswoman for WebMD, returned phone calls or e-mails seeking comment.

An ad on Facebook that read “Zestra Essential Arousal Oils — Try Zestra for Free” was pulled after several weeks. Ms. Braun Scherl and Ms. Jaensch received an e-mail stating that Facebook did not allow “advertisements that contain or promote adult content” including “sexual terms and/or images.” The women said they were unsuccessful in reaching Facebook officials to discuss the ad. Representatives from Facebook did not return calls or e-mails.

“Double standards abound when it comes to advertising anything having to do with our private parts,” said Robert J. Thompson, a professor of television and popular culture at Syracuse. “Commercials for erectile dysfunction products, which discuss not only sex but the hydraulic processes involved in having sex have played during major venues like the Super Bowl. They boldly tout male sexual pleasure as a commodity: an erection in a bottle.”

The difference with Zestra is that it “places female pleasure first, and even seems to suggest that this pleasure can be had with or without the presence of a man,” Mr. Thompson said. Indeed, in one online ad for Zestra, a woman says that, “It works so well, when I think about it, it even makes me want to go home and use it now.” There are no men anywhere in the picture.

Mr. Thompson acknowledges that some of the reluctance to broadcast the ads may have to do with the vague sense of what products like Zestra actually do. “If this product works as well as it claims, Victorian prissiness and the collective American embarrassment about sex will probably be trumped by the marketplace,” he said.

According to Ms. Braun Scherl and Ms. Jaensch, Zestra sales have increased month over month, and the business is growing. The product has also been featured on television shows like “Dr. Oz,” “Rachael Ray” and the “Tyra Banks.”

Still, “there is a huge unmet need, and we’re limited in our ability to get the message to men and women who would benefit from the product,” Ms. Braun Scherl said. “What I would say is, if there are standards for what is acceptable and what is not acceptable, they should be equally applied to products for male and female sexual enjoyment.”

Nokia Executive to Leave; Hints of Chairman’s Exit

By KEVIN J. O’BRIEN

A shake-up at the top of Nokia continued on Monday after the company said the head of its smartphone business would be leaving.

Nokia, which is the largest maker of mobile phones in the world, also confirmed that its longtime board chairman, Jorma Ollila, might step down from the board after the company’s general meeting in 2012.

The announcement of the departure of the head of the smartphone business, Anssi Vanjoki, a board member who has worked at Nokia for 19 years, came just days after Nokia named a new chief executive. It appointed Stephen Elop, a Canadian who headed Microsoft’s business software division, to replace Olli-Pekka Kallasvuo.

One analyst pointed to the high-level staff changes as signs that Nokia was seeking a transformation after losing ground to Apple and its iPhone.

“It would have been a mixed signal to investors to replace the chief executive and have the board chairman stay on,” said the analyst, Mats Nystrom of SEB Enskilda Bank in Stockholm.

Mr. Ollila oversaw the company’s ascent to the top of the market during his tenure as chief executive from 1992 through 2006. He also oversaw the selection of Mr. Kallasvuo, who was then his chief financial officer, as his successor.

Mr. Ollila was quoted by Finnish news media over the weekend as saying that he intended to remain at the board’s disposal as chairman until 2012, a deadline that investors interpreted as indicating his intention to leave the company. Nokia confirmed on Monday that he was considering stepping down in 2012.

Nokia has maintained its global market lead, currently 38 percent of the market, according to the British research firm Canalsys. But it has struggled to match the iPhone’s success and has stagnated in the United States, where it has less than 10 percent of the market. Its share price has lost more than half its value since Anssi Vanjoki, with a cutout of the 5800 XpressMusic at its 2008 introduction, is leaving as head of smartphones.

2007, when the iPhone was introduced.

“There was a feeling among some investors that the board at Nokia should have done something sooner to address the situation,” Mr. Nystrom said.

Mr. Ollila said last week that the board had considered several internal and external candidates before deciding on Mr. Elop, 46, a native of Ancaster, Ontario, to become the first non-Finn to be chief executive of Nokia.

Mr. Vanjoki ran the smartphone business from 2004-8, and again from May of this year. He was most likely one of several internal candidates considered for chief executive. In a statement on Monday, Nokia said Mr. Vanjoki, who holds the title of executive vice president and general manager for mobile solutions, had decided to leave in six months, after his notice period expired.

“I felt the time has come to seek new opportunities in my life,” said Mr. Vanjoki, 54, who oversaw development of Nokia’s N-Series line of smartphones. “At the same time, I am 100 percent committed to doing my best for Nokia until my very last working day.” Mr. Kallasvuo is remaining at the company as chairman of Nokia Siemens Networks.

Lionsgate and Televisa Unite on Films Aimed at Latinos

tried to till this ground, without success. In 1999, two Los Angeles companies announced plans to release as many as a dozen Spanish-language films in the United States a year. That effort fizzled after audiences ignored two early releases. In 2003, Universal Pictures scrapped a distribution agreement with Arenas Entertainment, a Latino film label.

Samuel Goldwyn Films got burned when it tried to tap the Hispanic market in 2001 with films like “Tortilla Soup.” At the time, Meyer Gottlieb, Samuel Goldwyn’s president, told The Los Angeles Times, “When it comes to filmed entertainment, they don’t view themselves as Latinos. They want to see it because everybody else wants to see it.”

But Mr. Azcárraga and Jon Feltheimer, chief executive of Lions Gate Entertainment, say they are confident they can succeed, citing figures showing that 37 million Hispanic moviegoers bought 300 million tickets in 2009, a per-moviegoer rate of more than eight tickets a year, the highest of any ethnic group.

Analysts say that, compared with other racial and ethnic groups, Latinos are the fastest-growing segment of the moviegoing audience and tend to buy more DVDs. At the same time, Latinos have started to drive results for broad releases; “Alvin and the Chipmunks,” from 20th Century Fox, and “Fast & Furious” from Universal blossomed into hits in large part because of support from Latino moviegoers, the studios said. At the art house, “Pan’s Labyrinth,” directed by Mexico-born Guillermo del Toro, has shown the potential for a crossover audience. That film, made for about $19 million, generated more than $83 million at the global box office.

Lionsgate has also been quietly experimenting with Spanish-language releases, finding moderate success with tiny films like “La Mujer de Mi Hermano” (“My Brother’s Wife”), which sold about $5 million in tickets in 2006.

“We have been interested in this market for a long time, but now we really think we can turn it into a business,” Mr. Feltheimer said.

The difference this time, the executives involved say, is experience. Lionsgate has a successful track record in marketing movies to niche audiences. Televisa’s strength is in production. And Pantelion has a potential ace up its sleeve: AMC Entertainment, North America’s second-largest movie theater chain behind Regal Entertainment. AMC’s chief executive, Geraldo Lopez, has agreed in advance to dedicate at least one screen in 50 of its theaters to Pantelion films. The theaters are in neighborhoods where more than a third of the population is Hispanic. Another chain, Cinemark, said it was in discussions with Pantelion to provide the fledgling production company with marketing support.

“Gee, if we can give them more culturally relevant product we may just get them to come to the movies a little bit more,” said Mr.

Lopez.

He said that was something he thought about not as a chief executive but as an average moviegoer. “It’s difficult to go to the movies and find Latinos in roles that are normal,” he said. “Instead, it’s the bad guy in the neighborhood, the guy with the tattoos. Rarely do you see a Latino portrayed as a businessman, for crying out loud.”

James M. McNamara, the former chief executive of Telemundo, will be Pantelion’s chairman and Paul Presburger, a longtime Lionsgate international executive, will be chief executive. Mr. Presburger said part of Pantelion’s strategy involved forging partnerships with consumer brands that were courting the same demographic. “We are deep in those conversations,” he said.

Mr. McNamara says he is hopeful that Pantelion will get a robust welcome from screenwriters and actors. “I think there is a lot of pent-up demand for this on behalf of the industry’s creative community,” he said.

“Had it not been for Ally & Gargano, Federal Express would probably not exist today.”

Toronto International Film Festival

For Briton Sally Hawkins, three's a charm

The multi-stage actress has multiple movies showing, too

By Claudia Puig
USA TODAY

TORONTO — British actress Sally Hawkins loves movies — even the not-so-great ones. “There’s always a piece of magic there, always a moment that engages or moves you,” she says. So it’s appropriate that she’s the big Toronto player — with three movies at the film festival. (She’s also starring now on Broadway in Mrs. Warren’s Profession, with Cherry Jones.) Hawkins, 34, stars in the much-buzzed-about Never Let Me Go, as well as Made in Dagenham and Submarine.

Don’t ask her to choose her favorite when it comes to theater vs. film. “I love both,” she says. “I’m interested in creating stories. Theater is how I got into acting and theater is how I learned.”

Even as a child in southeast London, she was always playing characters. “In primary school, I was engaged with creating characters with friends,” she says. “It was like an extension of play. There was something in there that I loved. It was magic. It made me happy. I was always creating these little playlets for friends. They were probably awful.”

She laments that she won’t have much time to actually watch movies at the festival: “I read the reviews and keep thinking, ‘I have to see that.’”

When it comes to her own films, “it’s always weird to watch yourself. It takes me a while to be objective. I’ll be thinking ‘What’s with the mouth? I didn’t know my mouth made that shape. It’s so big, what am I doing? Oh, don’t do that!’”

“But you just have to kind of get over it,” she says. “And the older I get, the less I worry.”

American audiences first became aware of her in a big way with 2008’s Happy Go Lucky, about an indefatigably optimistic schoolteacher. And though she’s charming and quick to laugh, she bears little resemblance to that character.

In Submarine, she plays an odd and self-absorbed mother of a teenage boy with a vivid imagination. In Made in Dagenham, set in 1968, she’s a machinist working long hours who engineers an important strike. In Never Let Me Go, she plays a teacher who wants her students to know the truth about their lives.

“I’ve been quite lucky I haven’t been typecast,” she says. “And it’s easy in this profession to be.”

But theater has a special allure for someone who’s all about creating characters.

“There’s nothing like a live audience,” she says. “The immediate gratification of it. It’s great, so very different from film.”

Even so, she adds, “it’s terrifying to be on Broadway, and it’s also very exciting.”

20 years later, Clint enters ‘Hereafter’

Clint Eastwood was on hand this weekend for the premiere of his new film, Hereafter. The last time Eastwood showed a film at the festival was for 1990’s White Hunter, Black Heart.

He recalled that he was first at the festival 46 years ago with A Fistful of Dollars.

Aronofsky seems so normal ...

Dressed in weekend casual and showing little wear-and-tear from visiting three film festivals in a row in the past two weeks, Darren Aronofsky exudes the sort of pleasant demeanor that one would welcome in a next-door neighbor.

That is, until you see his visually assaulting films with obsessive characters whose urges often lead to their own destruction. Pi, Requiem for a Dream and The Wrestler all exhibit degrees of these elements. But Black Swan, his psycho-sexual thriller set in the cutthroat world of competitive ballet, pushes such themes to the max.

So what’s a nice 41-year-old family man with a lovely companion, actress Rachel Weisz, and a 4-year-old son doing with a résumé of get-under-your-skin cinema? “I think people who go to extremes make for interesting characters,” he says.

Strangers hear things you wouldn’t tell friends

tice that is natural and often beneficial,” says John Locke, a linguistics professor at the City University of New York.

“We teach people they should mind their own business,” he says, but “that’s extremely bad advice. It’s dangerous because you won’t see the terrorist next door making a bomb; you won’t see the kids being abused, or the husband beating up a wife. If there wasn’t any eavesdropping, if people minded their own business and ignored what they saw and heard, how would you prevent and how would you solve crimes?”

Locke, author of a new book, Eavesdropping: An Intimate History, says apes keep an eye on each other to maintain order, and we humans have neighborhood watch programs.

But eavesdropping is more than just listening in. It’s glancing over at someone else’s laptop screen to see what they’re doing. It’s peering into an apartment window as you walk by. It’s catching a glimpse through a door that’s slightly ajar. It’s trolling Facebook to see what your friends are saying to others.

And yes, it’s a bit thrilling, he says. “There is something quite tantalizing about this behavior.”

But is it really eavesdropping if they’re broadcasting and we can’t help overhearing?

“I don’t regard it at all as me eavesdropping,” says Etta Baranoff, who has overheard plenty of cellphone conversations in 15 years of traveling twice a week as an associate professor of insurance and finance at Virginia Commonwealth University in Richmond. “We think no matter where we are, we are in our own living room, but we are not. We are walking with our phones as if we are in our own homes.”

No keyholes needed

“It’s a generational and cultural change,” says W. Keith Campbell, a professor of psychology at the University of Georgia in Athens.

“That old image of sticking your ear to a keyhole — we don’t need to do it anymore,” Campbell says. “Our personal lives are much more open.”

What’s changed is that more private behavior, such as personal phone calling, happens in public today, says social psychologist Robert Kraut of Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh. It may seem like eavesdropping, but the “victim” is no longer the person being eavesdropped on, he says — it’s “the overhearers, who can’t get away. What had once been private behavior is now being shoved in their face.”

Fischer, author of Made in America: A Social History of American Culture and Character, says it’s ironic that “a cellphone call overheard while walking down the street is a throwback to (party lines) where everybody knew everybody’s business.”

Whether eavesdropping is by choice or forced makes a big difference, Locke says.

“If someone is speaking low, people will lean in the direction of the message. But if people are speaking loudly on a cellphone, they’ll back the other way. We resent the fact they are broadcasting personal information. We want the option of tuning in.”

This dichotomy is evident in new research on public cellphone use. One study, to be presented to the National Communication Association in November, included 15- to 20-minute observations of 19,741 people using cellphones on a college campus from 2005 to 2008. Researcher Yi-Fan Chen of Old Dominion University in Norfolk, Va., found that mobile devices “blurred boundaries between public and private spaces.” Her 2009 survey found cellphones were most often used on the street, observers said, “in a loud or annoying manner.”

Another study, in the journal Behaviour & Information Technology in 2004, found cellphone conversations “significantly more noticeable and annoying than face-to-face” at the same volume.

“There is an idea in social psychology that you can talk about intimate things to strangers because they are not part of your network and are not considered to be a risk,” Campbell says. “If you’re actually in public and clearly don’t know people, it’s almost seen as a private space.”

Some say today’s mix of easy information sharing and celebrity-driven media culture is making us more narcissistic. With Facebook and Twitter, we’re more willing to showcase our lives for all who want to look or listen. We can tell our friends our innermost thoughts, but those who aren’t so close also see.

“Go into an airport and you hear people talking in a particularly loud voice, so people think they’re important or have status. There’s a subset of people that ties in more with narcissism and attention-seeking that are using these channels to get attention,” says Campbell, co-author of The Narcissism Epidemic.

Gleaning new information

But the fact that you can watch or listen on social networks without engaging “has some real advantages,” says Keith Hampton, assistant professor of communication at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia.

“It’s exposure to little bits of information you would never otherwise have had access to,” he says. “And little bits of information can be really important. You have access to new ideas, and not from very close social ties that know what you know.”

Pop culture expert Richard Lachmann, a sociology professor at the University at Albany, State University of New York, says it’s not just the idea of privacy that has changed. He believes the very nature of eavesdropping is up for debate, since people are willing to share more and more personal information.

“Everybody still has a notion of eavesdropping. It’s somebody trying to hear something they haven’t been invited to hear. What’s changing is what goes in that category,” he says.

“It used to be people had a real long list of things that were private and only heard by a few, and a short list of things that would be public. For many people, that’s moved from one list to another.”
